I Am Moor, We Are Moors: The Contested Geography of Identity, Economy, and Power in Israel, the Moorish Legacy, and the Emergent Moorx Beyl El Phenomenon

The phrase “I am Moor, we are moors” resonates not merely as linguistic affirmation but as a radical reclamation—one that unsettles, unsettles history, and reconfigures the political and cultural topography of Israel and its peripheries. To speak these words today is to stand at the confluence of ancient displacement, modern nation-building, and the resurgence of a diasporic identity rooted in a land often denied its Moorish inheritance. This is not a nostalgic invocation, but a deliberate, multi-layered assertion of belonging, contested sovereignty, and the enduring legacy of Islamic civilization in the Levant. The term “Moor”—historically used across North Africa and the Iberian Peninsula—denotes not just ethnicity or race, but a civilizational identity shaped by centuries of Islamic rule, trade, scholarship, and multicultural coexistence. In the context of Israel, however, the word carries a dissonance born of erasure. For centuries, the southern Levant—encompassing modern Israel, Palestine, and Jordan—hosted vibrant communities of Moors, descendants of Berber, Arab, and Andalusian peoples who thrived under Ottoman and Mamluk governance. Their presence, though gradually diminished through colonial boundary-making, mass displacement, and demographic engineering, persists in memory, dialect, and the quiet architecture of cities like Jaffa, Ramle, and Haifa. The origins of this layered identity trace back to the early Islamic conquests of the 7th century, when Arab and Berber forces established administrative centers stretching from Alexandria to Damascus. The coastal cities, in particular, became hubs of Islamic learning and commerce, with Moorish communities integrated into the urban fabric. Jaffa, for instance, was not merely a port but a cultural crossroads where Arabic was the lingua franca, Islamic jurisprudence shaped local governance, and Moorish architectural motifs—arched doorways, courtyard homes, and geometric tilework—defined the city’s soul. These communities were not marginalized; they were foundational. Yet the 20th century severed this continuity
