The journey from plinth to paramount—Neetu Singh's *Volume 2: Plinth to Paramount*—is not merely a title; it is an analytical lens through which one can trace the tectonic shifts in postcolonial urban power, architectural sovereignty, and the reconfiguration of national identity in the era of global capital. This book, far from a dry architectural treatise, is a deep excavation of how space becomes sovereignty, and how the physical foundations of cities in South Asia have been reimagined under pressures of globalization, statecraft, and cultural memory. Singh, a journalist whose work has dissected power with unflinching precision, does not simply chronicle buildings; she decodes the invisible geometries of authority inscribed in concrete, steel, and urban planning. The origins of *Plinth to Paramount* lie not in architectural theory alone, but in the lived contradictions of India's urban transformation. The "plinth"—historically the base of a structure, a functional and symbolic threshold—has long been a site of negotiation between tradition and modernity, between colonial impositions and indigenous spatial logic. Yet Singh reveals how, in the 21st century, the plinth has been redefined not just as a physical level, but as a metonym for political legitimacy, economic ambition, and cultural resilience. Volume 2 expands on her earlier insights, tracing a trajectory from the post-independence era to the present, where megaprojects, real estate empires, and state-led urban renewal collide in a struggle over the very ground upon which nations are built. Singh begins with the colonial blueprint: British urban planning in cities like New Delhi was less about organic growth than about spatial control. The plinth, raised and monumental, was both a defensive posture and a visual declaration of imperial permanence. The Raj's grid, its plinths elevated and symmetrical, projected order over chaos—though that order served a hierarchical logic. Post-1947, India inherited this architecture, but with a new political imperative: to reclaim the plinth not as a relic of foreign rule, but as a canvas for national self-expression. The Rashtrapati Bhavan, the Parliament complex, the India Gate—all were not just buildings, but semiotic anchors in a nascent democracy's quest for dignity. But Singh does not romanticize this transition. She dissects the paradoxes embedded in post-independence urbanism: the persistence of colonial spatial hierarchies beneath nationalist facades, the commodification of public space, and the rise of elite enclaves that redefine the plinth as a privilege rather than a public good. The 1991 economic liberalization marked a turning point. As liberal capitalism flooded Indian cities with speculative capital, the plinth became a terrain of contestation. The same land that once symbolized sovereign authority was now a currency—priced in square meters, traded in megaprojects, and weaponized by developers and politicians alike. Volume 2 pivots to the emergence of what Singh terms “paramount plinths”—sites where power, capital, and symbolism converge at unprecedented scale. These are not merely skyscrapers or government complexes, but hybrid typologies: smart cities, diplomatic enclaves, cultural precincts, and transit hubs—each designed to project permanence, prestige, and control. Take the GIFT City near Ahmedabad, a planned financial district built on reclaimed wetlands. It is a plinth elevated not just geographically, but politically: a sovereign space carved from nature, governed by special economic laws, and populated by global finance. Here, the plinth is no longer organic or historical—it is engineered, engineered to serve a vision of India as a global economic player. Singh details how such projects are underwritten by state guarantees, tax incentives, and legal exemptions, creating what she calls “jurisdictional islands” insulated from public accountability. The geopolitical subtext is unmistakable. As India asserts itself on the world stage, its urban plinths have become stages for soft power projection and hard strategic positioning.
